The same newspaper circulars inform us that the House of Commons, in the public gardens, is filled with the most elegantly dressed people of the city, and that the accommodation of the proprietors of the gardens, with booths, tents, and carriages, is the most perfect of any in the United States. His House is a pleasant part of the city, and no one will be spared any part of the pleasant sensation that will be enjoyed by all who enter it with their parasols, to be continued there till it is dark.
